WASHINGTON, D.C. — Top journalists will pursue topics ranging from dark matter to the mining of the seas and the birth of the U.S. Chemical Warfare Service as the newest recipients of an Alicia Patterson Foundation grant, American journalism's oldest writing fellowship.

The annual fellowships are designed to foster independent in-depth reporting on national and international affairs. The Alicia Patterson Foundation fellowship program for journalists was established in 1965 in memory of Alicia Patterson, who was editor and publisher of Newsday for nearly twenty-three years before her death in 1963.

The Fellows are awarded $40,000 for a 12-month grant and $20,000 for a six-month grant.

The new Fellows will spend their fellowship months traveling, researching, and writing articles on their projects for the APF REPORTER, a quarterly web magazine published by the Foundation. Every year, the Fellows' articles and photo essays are widely distributed through newspapers, news services, magazines, and websites worldwide. Fellows' work often is published jointly with their "home" news outlet and has resulted in many national awards.

The winners were selected through a highly competitive process of screening by three panels of judges, as well as submitting detailed proposals, examples of past work, and references.

More than 330 reporters, editors, and photographers have won Alicia Patterson fellowships since the foundation was established in 1965 to honor the former publisher of Newsday.

The trustees of the foundation named one fellow in honor of Josephine Patterson Albright, a former Newsday columnist and major benefactor of the foundation. The Josephine Patterson Albright fellow is Randall Hyman, who will be examining the changing climate in the Arctic, focusing on commercial fishing, technology and adaptation to environmental damage.
